Dear Representative Davis, Representative Roybal-Allard, Senator Casey, Senator Baldwin and Senator Brown:

On behalf of over 110 organizations dedicated to reducing child poverty in the United States, we thank you for your leadership in reintroducing the Child Poverty Reduction Act \(S. 4115/H.R. 7419\), which would codify a national target to cut the U.S. child poverty rate in half within a decade.

No child in the world's wealthiest nation should go to bed hungry or be deprived of clean air or be without the opportunities that come from having a safe, affordable place to call home.

Yet even before the outbreak of the COVID-19 health emergency, child poverty was a moral crisis in the United States that affected each and every one of us. Our child poverty rate remains consistently higher than that of our peer countries, and children in the United States continue to experience poverty at a rate 54 percent higher than adults. Due to our country's long history of systemic racism and discrimination, poverty rates for children of color are nearly three times that of white children. Annual child poverty figures from the U.S. Census Bureau underestimate the problem, for families with children living at twice the official poverty threshold still lack enough income to make ends meet.

The pandemic and resulting economic crisis have only served to expose and further exacerbate these existing inequities in our society. New data tells us that an additional 2.5 million children are living in poverty than before the pandemic. The U.S. economy is down over 11 million jobs, with many more workers underemployed and seeing reduced paychecks. Households of color with children are being hit the hardest by unemployment, as well as experiencing higher rates of infection and fatality from COVID-19 as parents are over-represented as essential workers and often lack access to paid sick leave. The closure of schools and childcare centers are leaving parents and guardians with few options for childcare and wraparound services while also creating widening education gaps.

Aid passed by Congress has helped – research from Columbia's Center on Poverty & Social Policy finds that provisions in the Coronavirus Aid, Relief, and Economic Security (CARES) Act, specifically expansion to unemployment benefits and the establishment of one-time Recovery Rebate payments, may have prevented child poverty from temporarily spiking. Yet this assistance has expired without additional action from Congress, and we know that many children and families continue to face significant economic hardship, including high rates of hunger and housing insecurity.

Growing up in poverty has life-long consequences for a child's physical and mental health and economic well-being. In addition to negative consequences for individual children, child poverty has serious economic implications, costing our country approximately $1 trillion a year. Yet a 2019 landmark study from the nonpartisan National Academies of Sciences, Engineering and Medicine confirms that we know how to reduce child poverty in the United States, we just lack the political will to act. Written by our nation's leading experts on child poverty, A Roadmap to Reducing Child Poverty models a set of policy and program changes that, if implemented, would cut our child poverty rate in half within a decade.

The Child Poverty Reduction Act establishes a framework for holding our nation's decisionmakers accountable to reducing child poverty by codifying a commitment to cut our national child poverty rate in half within a decade and directing the National Academy of Sciences to issue annual reports on progress towards this goal.

The effectiveness of targets in reducing child poverty is well-established. The United Kingdom cut its child poverty rate in half between 1999 and 2008 and before the outbreak of COVID-19, Canada had reduced child poverty by over a third in since 2015. There is also momentum here in the United States, with campaigns in several states dedicated to reducing child poverty.

Other provisions of the Child Poverty Reduction Act include:

- Requiring the U.S. Census Bureau to develop an anchored Supplemental Poverty Measure to use to annually track progress on child poverty that includes data on children in the U.S. territories;
- Directing the National Academy of Sciences to establish a Child Poverty Reduction Strategy Clearinghouse;
- Mandating the National Academy of Sciences to update A Roadmap to Reducing Child Poverty within three years;
- Directing the National Academy of Sciences to publish a new consensus study on policies to reduce long-term, intergenerational child poverty.

The future of our nation depends on the well-being and success of our children. We are grateful for your leadership in making child poverty reduction a priority, and we look forward to working with you to improve the well-being of America's children and youth.
